JENA AND SEDAN. (From the Telegraph's Correspondent.)

Paris, April 14th. It is somewhat ominous that at the very time when the press of England is discussing the mennes which Prince Bismarck has sent to France, so important a journal as the Constitutionnel should be pointing out the magnitude of the disasters which Prussia suffered at the hands of Franco in 1806. The Constitutionnel of this morning shows that Jena was the Sedan of Prussia. Terrible indeed was the disorganisation of France after Sedan, but it was not so great as that of Prussis after Jena. The raw levies of France fell down before the troops of Prince Charles and of General Manteuffel like so much ripe corn before the sickle of a strong swift reaper; they fell down as if at the touch of fatality. Yet still more abject was the humiliation of the troops whose fathers had been drilled into invincibility by Frederick the Great, Erfurt, garrisoned with 10,000 men, and furnished with enormous supplies, surrendered with-out striking a blow. Magdebourg capitulated, although it held 24,000 men and 6,500 horses, was armed with 600 guns, and supplied with unlimited provisions; it espitulated to Ney, although his men were fewer than its own. Spandau, the citatel of Berlin, fell without firing a shot, despite the pledge of the commandant that he would conquer or die among the ruins, After a short resistance, Pronslau opened its gates and delivered 10,000 troops into the hand of Murut. A Prussian brigade of 4,200 mon haid down it arms without drawing a trigger. At the first summons of 800 French soldiera Stettin hung out the white flag, and its garrison of 5.000 men became prisoners. A Prossian brigade laid down its arms at the summons of a detachment of French cavalry, although the troopers were unaided by a single ticalities, and those who are but the passive cannon; two days afterwards another Prussian followers of their example would copy that exbrigade equally placed itself at the mercy of a sample, when unperverted, with as much docility small band. The fortresses of Custrin, Plass as they now copy its perverted forms. Let these scaburg, Hamolu, Nicuburg, Giogan, Breslen, be felt to weaken the sense of dignity which Brieg. Schweidnitz, Ocael and Neisse, all they were originally intended to strengthen, fell in rapid succession; and only two hold out in a manner dictated by the men, will be, must be, followed by passive bosts; nor the munitions, and the provisions at their can we blame them, as long as these represent command. Not one Prussian town offered to them increased self-respect, and stand as a resistance which can be named in the same signs of so much added to dignity. - Victoria breath with the resistance of Phalaborg, Strasbourg, Metz, or Paris Not one of the trained Prassing-armies-displayed-such-powers-as-theraw gountry lads who, half-srmed and halfdrilled, fought a losing battle for a whole week on the plain of the Loire, until the vineyards were red with their blood. The final judge of that fact is King Frederick William III., who then ruled over Prussia, and who, in the first lays after the capitulation, expressed in a solemn address his sense of the manner in which the countrymen of Frederick the Great had defended their homes. The King branded the sapitulations as "unparalleled." He degraded a number of superior officers, and some be condemned to death. He menuced with death those who, in the future, should display equal lorgetfulness of duty. He threatened to shoot

Such is a summary of the long article which appears in the Constitutionnel of this morning. And the moral is this: Prussia suffered more 7 --- in 1806 than we did in 1871. Her disasters were swift, crushing, and humiliating. She lost more territory, more power, and more prestige." But her disasters did her a priceless service; for they taught her that she must reorganise her army, and it was on the morrow of Jena that her statesmen began to reconstruct that military machine which became resistless in the bands of Moltke. France must follow the example of Prussia. In her defeat she must find a schoolmaster. She, too, must drill the whole of her men, build strong places along her frontiers, and surround Paris with a new line of forts. Thus, and thus alone, can she should listen to what is said in self-defence by the more candid minds of this country. "It is true," they tell us, " that we wish to organise a" powerful army -a more powerful army than we possessed when the Empire was mad enough to arm our whole population as effectively as Germany has armed hers. But it is not true that we mean to throw our troops upon the German army of occupation, or that we will refuse to pay the remainder of the indemnity, or that we have the slightest intention to break faith in any other way with our conqueror. All such assertions are gratuitous falsehoods, told for the manifest purpose of giving Prussia an excuse to dictate the terms of our Army Bill What we may do in the future, when we and Prussia shall be quits, is a question that we ourselves cannot answer. We have not unade up our minds. But we will, at least, insist on being the masters in our own house. Never will we submit 'to let Prussia dictate how we shall arm, ourselves. To do so would be to efface ourselves from the map of Europe." As I have informed you in a telegram, fash-ionable. Paris is surprised and shocked to find that the luxury of duelling must be bought by residence in prison. The strange fact was revenled yesterday in the trial of the Prince de Bibesco for fighting a duel with the Prince de Bauffrement. They had quarrelled on account of some offensive words which M. de Bauffremont had written respecting M. de Bibesco in the pleadings of a process which was judged in 1870. Fifteen months after they were penned. the expressions met the eye of M. de Bibesco and the result was a challenge. The combat auts met at the Calle Saint Cloud, and M. de Bauffrement received a wound which confined him to bed for ten days. When the authorities beard of the combat they cited the challenger and no doubt be fancied that he would be punished with a trivial fine, like a long list of instant. other duellists who had only wounded their adversary. But it was in the days of the Empire that this law was administered with such laxity, and the Republic aims at a more Puritan standard of virtue. Great therefore was the amazement of the noble duellist and his friends when they heard the advocate of the Republic demanding that the Prince should be punished with imprisonment "Imprison a man who had only defend ed his own bonour!" exclaimed his advowith indignation; "such a penalty would make the prison envied! Imprison a nobleman, who, although not a Frenchman, had fought for France, and carried on his breast the tokens of his bravery in the shape of the Cross of the Legion of Honour!" Such pleas go more directly to the heart of French than of English judges, and a year or two ago they would have been so powerful that the Prince would only have been condemned to pay a trivial fine. But yesterday the judges steeled the 1st September, 1871. their hearts against the sentimental rhetoric, and decreed that the Prince should in imprisoned for fifteen days. Frenchmen deem the penalty heavy, for they have not yet learned to see the barbarity of daelling. Officers of the army take, perhaps, the highest place among challengers, and next come journalists. The chief writers do not, it is true, cast insults and carrels at each other; they have abandoned that practice, I think, since the day when the most illustrious member of their craft, M. Armand Carrel was shot by M. Emile de Girardin. But the lesser journalists seem to write with a rapier by their side and seconds in the next room. One journal in particular seems to be edited and written by a detachment of such swash-bucklers as, a couple of centuries ago, were sometimes found in the service of great bouses. They have but one argument-insult but one kind of satire-insult; but one form of proof-insuit, always insult. Occasionally the COSTUME. The love of dress may be traced in a parallel way back to the sense of dignity. As clothing amongst primitive races of men particles of the character of an extension of drnament. rather than ornament of an addition to clothing, ornament may be say to have been of superior importance. Now ornamental additions were intended to enhance personal impressions: whether to overawe by adding to the terror, or to attract by adding to the beauty, of one's appearance. The orgaments Nature bestows on animals decidedly anto. Man, having to procure them by his COPPERSMITHS & BRASSFOUNDERS. labour, has the motive strengthened by this No. 1, Queen's Road East and Nullah Lane, exercise. From the earliest experiments in feathers and war-paint men have sought to imhaustion. After 1870 France butt lost her ceased to do so; though for the generality of mankind the effect by means of dress is rather to please than to overawe. This desire to impress others, whatever the means chosen, is one form of the sense of dignity; and, since dress is a circumstance which promotes. that impression, the sense of dignity, is furthered by the attempts of dress to enhance awe or beauty. Furthered at first, but afterwards obscured, by the amusement and excitement of the attempt. From being an assistance in promoting a sense of dignity, dress, generally slides down into an amusing occupation, and in the funtastic annuls of fushion the original intention has passed through so many modes of adornment that it is well-nigh buried beneath the mountain of vagaries, and can only be traced here and there in the proceedings of such passive mortals as bring their modicum of uniformity to the heap solely that they may not lose the respect of others; for isit not the readlest, sometimes the only, way left open to them for giving utterance to the self-respect inseparable from the sense of dignity? To blame these passive followers of of fashion as always, or even generally, actuated by the same motives as the leaders would be unjust; it is with them an abortive search after means of promoting the sense of dignity. The charge of so perverting ideas as to allow the sense of dignity to be supposed consistent with gaudy finery or meaningless ornamentation must be laid at the door of those who encourage the vagaries for mere love of excitoment. The savage, devoid of resthetic culture, with a narrow range of material, must try all sorts of odd and startling experiments; but that after such centuries of civilisation mankind all turn back to barbaric measures seems only another proof of the incompleteness of our culture. If those in whose hands lies the power of promoting these vagaries, whoever they may be, would keep sight of their true relations, they would cease to invent or rake up perpetual fantastheir day would be doomed. Till then vagaries

BY DENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

At Stralaund, by the Baltic Son, Within the sandy bar, At sunset of a summer's day, Ready for sea, at anchor lay The good ship Valdemar, The sunbeams danced upon the waves, And played along bereide. And through the cabin windows streame In ripples of golden light, that seemed. The ripple of the tide.

There sat the captain with his friends,-Old skippers brown and bale, And talked of iceberg and of fog, Of calm and storm and gale. And one was apinning a sailor's yarn About Klaboterman.

The Kabold of the sea; a sprite Invisible to mortal sight, Who o'er the rigging mn. Sometimes he hammered in the bold. Sometimes upon the mast, Sometimes abeam, sometimes abaft, Or at the bows he sang and laughed, And made all tight and fast.

He belped the sailors at their work; And toiled with jovial din; He belied them hoist and reef the sails, the belied them stow the casks and bales, And heave the anchor in. But woe unto the lazy louts,

The idlers of the crew: Them to turmant is his delight. And worry them by day and night,
And pinch them black and blue. And wee to him whose mortal eyes Klaboterman behold: It is a certain sign of death !— The eabin yoy here held his breath, He felt his blood run cold.

The jolly skipper paused awhile, And then again began; There is a Spectre Ship," quoth he, " A Ship of the Dead, that sails the sea, And is called the Carmilban. " A ghostly ship, with a ghostly craw. In tempests she appears: And before the gale, or against the gale, She sails without a rag of sail. Without a helmsman steers.

"She bannts the Atlantic north and south - But mostly the mid-sea. Like furnace chimneys in the air. And are called the Chimneys Three ... "And ill betide the luckless ship-That meets the Carmilban :. Over her decks the seas will leap She must go down into the deep. And perish mouse and man.

"I should like to see this ship," said he: "I should like to find these Chimneys That are marked down in the chart, "I have sailed right over the apot," he said " With a good stiff breeze behind. When the sea was blue, and the sky was Right into Eternity!

Eight bells! and suddenly abaft, With a great rush of rain, Making the ocean white with spume In darkness like the day of doors, On came the barricane. The lightning finshed from cloud to cloud And tore the dark in two .; A jagged flame, a single jet. Of white fine, like a bayonet, That pierced his eyeballs through. Then all around was dark again. And blacker than before: But in that single flash of light The captain saw a fearful sight. And thought of the oath he swore. For right ahead lay the Ship of the Dead, ller masts were stripped, her yards word And on her bowsprit,-poised in air, Sat the Klaboterman. Her crew of ghosts was all on deck Or clambering up the sironds; The boatewain's whistle, the captain's hai Were like the piping of the gale,

The chostly Carmillonn!

And thunder in the clouds. And close behind the Carmilhan There rose up from the sea. As from a foundered ship of stone, There bare and splintered musts alone; -They were the Chimneys Three! And onward dushed the Valdemar And leaped into the dark; A denser mist, a colder blast,

A little shudder, and she had passed Right through the Phantom Bark. She cleft in twain the shadowy hulk, But cleft it unaware: As when careering to her nest, The sea-gall severs with her breast

The nuresisting air. Again the lightning flashed; again They saw the Carmilban. Whole as before in hull and spar: But now on board of the Valdemar Stood-the Klaboterman.

And they all knew their doom, was sealed: They knew that death was near; Some prayed who never prayed before, And some they wept, and some they swore And some were mute with fear. Then auddenly there came a shock, And louder than wind or sea A cry burst from the crew on deck,

Upon the Chimneys Three. The storm and night were passed, the light To streak the east began; The cahin-hoy, picked up at sea, Survived the wreck, and only be, To tell of the Carmilhan. -The Atlantic Monthly.
